Baltimore is a religiously diverse and racially segregated city. Religious leaders and communities in the city have been both supporters of this disparity and active opponents to the racial inequality. During this month’s Humanities in the Village, Professor Harold Morales of Morgan State will provide examples of religious movements that seek to eliminate racial inequality, and discuss potential benefits of and concerns with collaborations between scholars of religion and community partners.

Presented in partnership with the Alexander Grass Humanities Institute